Why might investors want to use a limited company? From a purely financial perspective, there are three obvious reasons why you might want to hold property as a company rather than yourself. 1. Tax treatment of profits. If you own a property in your own name, the profits you make from renting it out will be added to your other earnings (such as from your job) and taxed as income tax. But if instead you hold it within a company, the profits will be liable for Corporation Tax instead.

Buying through a company: the pros and cons | Property Geek

Registering your property in a company allows you to, at the time of acquisition of the immovable property, sign the agreement of sale on behalf of a company "to be formed". The downside of this method is that there is a higher rate of transfer duty and CGT payable than by individuals. Annual financial statements must also be submitted.

Switching property to a company The transfer of existing properties into a company would be treated as a sale by you to the company and you would be liable to Capital Gains Tax (CGT). You might also face a stamp duty charge for any property over the sum of £125,000. This could make the switch very expensive.

Buying property Through a limited company

Buying properties through a company allows you to avoid the harsh reductions in landlord tax relief that have recently been introduced. Instead, a corporate setup lets you continue off-setting your buy-to-let mortgage interest against your profits, which are subject to Corporation Tax of 19 per cent rather than the higher individual income tax rates.
